

AMERICAN FENCE

Made of Hard, Stiff Wire, of Honest Quality

A Heavy American Fence Costs You No More Per Rod Than Lighter Fences of Other Makes

A roll of heavy fence means big wire. Big wire means more strength and longer life. Insist upon the dealer weighing the roll of fence he sells you. This will tell the story quicker than any other way, for you cannot always tell the size of wire by eye. American Fence will stand this test against any fence made, and will prove its greater weight. Why, then, pay the same money for a lighter fence?

American Fence is made of hard, stiff steel. It is made of a quality of wire drawn expressly for woven-wire-fence purposes by the largest manufacturers of wire in the world. Galvanized by latest improved processes, the best that the skill and experience of years has taught. Built on the same elastic hinged-joint (patented) principle, which effectually protects the stay or upright wires from breaking under hard usage.

Test, judge and compare American Fence under any and all conditions and you will find that the steel, the structure and the galvanizing are equal in durability, strength and efficiency to the hardest uses.

THE MAN WHO THOUGHT

By DONAL HAMILTON HAINES.

Copyright, 1910, by the Pearson Publishing company.

When young Fultener's rich father, in a supreme effort to effect his wayward son's redemption, despatched him on a six-months' trip around the world, he made a long speech in a voice that was almost feminine in its tenderness, and gave him a slip of paper on which, penned in the bold paternal hand, were three "don'ts": "Don't cable for more money!" "Don't borrow!" "Don't buy what you can't pay for!"

Obedience to these, owing to the generous figures on his letter of credit, the young man had found far less difficult than adherence to certain principles, involving the overthrow of be-setting habits which, though implied in the gentle parental address, had been neither written nor put into directly spoken words. But there came a time, at length, when all the world, save the Atlantic Ocean, was behind him, as were most of his faults as well, when those "don'ts" rose like so many formidable giants, and declared: "Thus far, and no farther." And if in the stress of their overcoming a possibly ill-disciplined conscience failed utterly to make protest, and the nicer scruples never so much as lifted a warning finger, who shall say that familiarity with some of the modern methods of high finance in general, and of his father's methods in particular, was not largely responsible for his seeming moral obliquity?

A lesson grew out of the episode, at all events; and under a new and uplifting stimulus, he— But to begin at the beginning:

Young David Farragut Fultener reached London with three hundred pounds sterling to his credit at Brown's. He was so proud of this evidence of rare financial management, that, on his third day in the British capital, he drew it. A portion of it, he decided, should be devoted to the purchase of a few delayed presents for certain dear folk in America. Then his passage was to be provided for, and his far from immodest bill at the Carlton. But before any one of the three purposes was accomplished, he lost the money. In some astounding, unfathomable fashion, his three one-hundred-pound Bank of England notes disappeared, leaving him with a scant ten pounds loose in a trousers pocket.

When he had made diligent search in places likely and unlikely, and had instituted quite as comprehensive an inquiry, all without the least shadow of result, he began figuring on the possibility of meeting his small London indebtedness and getting home by way of the steerage with the sum remaining. But with small economies—with how to shave off a shilling here and a sixpence there—he was not familiar, and his best mathematical endeavors left him a full thirty shillings short of the required amount.

There occurred at this juncture, too, an encounter which so broadened the borders of his necessity as to make the thirty-shilling shortage appear very picaunish indeed. He met an American girl on the Strand.

In spite of peak and pallor and an evident effort not to be noticed, he recognized her at once. Back in the old days, he had held her in higher esteem than she was conscious of, for the reason that she was about the only really hard-working, modest, and absolutely good young woman of the chorus that he knew. And for that reason, to his discredit be it said, he knew her, indeed, but slightly.

She was slender and fairly tall, and of a rich dark beauty that suggested the Southern. Fultener had always been impressed by something inexplicably appealing in the luminous depths of her wonderful dark eyes; and it was those eyes now, and that appeal, never so compelling before, which arrested and held him and identified her to him amid the throng that was passing the Somerset House, on this gray, misty, murky September morning. Did it, too, indeed, in spite of his own absorption and of her quick turning of her head at sight of him.

He had to speak her name—Alice Davenport she was called—before she would admit seeing him; and, even then, she was for passing on, after a word and a bow; but he detained her. After the brief exchange of commonplace he found this detaining not at all difficult. She seemed to realize that there had been a change in him since she last saw him, and the change made him much more likable than he had ever been before.

"I'll bet you a guinea that you're broke," he said with a laugh, after eliciting the facts that she had come over in April, with the "Queen of the Isles" company, and had been "let out" over a month ago, because she declined an invitation to take supper with the new stage manager.

"If I should bet you, you'd win; and I should certainly never be able to pay," she replied; and though it was said with a brave effort of gaiety, Fultener noticed that her lip trembled, in spite of her.

"I thought you were more provident," he ventured; "that you would have saved at least enough for a ticket back to Broadway."

At that her lip trembled some more, and, to the young man's dismay and, personal reproach, her deeply incensed eyes suddenly became overflowing crystalline wells.
